A HEROIC EXAMPLE.

How a French Officer Braved the Infection of Cholera.

Exposure to the fire of an enemy is not the only form of bravery which an officer or a soldier may be called upon to show. Not long ago the French papers chronicled the death of Lieut. Col. Azan, of the army, of infectious pneumonia contracted while visiting a military hospital where there were cases of this disease, and encouraging the men. In connection with this case, the exploit of Col. Gardarens, of the sixth regiment of the line, also in the French army, is recalled.

During one of the Algerian campaigns, when the position of the French troops was somewhat precarious, some cases of cholera appeared in the regiment. They were all in one mess. A feeling of panic spread among the men, which it was necessary to allay in some way, in order to prevent a disaster.

At that time the fact was not fully known that cholera is communicated wholly through the food and drink, and is in no other way "contagious." But Col. Gardarens had reason to believe that it was not infectious in the ordinary sense.

One evening a man had died of cholera in the quarters and lay dead on his bed. The men had fled from the vicinity in consternation. The colonel ordered them to follow him to the presence of the victim of cholera and they obeyed.

With his own hands he lifted the dead man from his bed and had the body removed. "Now I will show you," he said, "that cholera is not infectious. I shall pass the night on this man's bed."

He did so. Not only did he crawl into the dead soldier's bed, without any change of the clothing, but the wondering soldiers heard him snoring tranquilly through the hours of the night. In the morning he rose, dressed, gave the military salute and departed, having evidently rested well.

Whatever the soldiers may have thought, they were debarr'd by this example from showing any further signs of panic. —Youth's Companion.

History Retold.

The Emperor Nero had a good many faults, among them being that of vanity. He has gained the reputation of cruelty largely on account of the fact that he insisted upon appearing in public as an amateur actor. His ambition, however, was to play the fiddle before a large popular audience, but for a time no suitable opportunity arose. At last, in the tenth year of his reign, Rome was almost entirely destroyed by fire, and the whole population was out in the streets. "At last," he said, "my chance has come." And he sallied forth with his fiddle in one hand and an original composition in the other. Having seated himself on the top of a pile of smoldering ruins, he struck up a nocturne in 17 sharps and five flats. But the people did not seem to be pleased. "Don't look vexed," he called out. "I am not unfeeling, but I have always understood that when there has been a fire the best thing that can be done is to play on the ruins." —Judy.
